In 1979, POST received LEAA funding to develop job-related tests of reading, writing, and physical ability that could be used to select entry-level patrol officers. A survey of California Chiefs and Sheriffs that had been conducted just prior to the awarding of the LEAA grant indicated that local administrators were concerned about finding better methods of screening job applicants on the basis of these abilities. POST was further informed that it could best serve the needs of local law enforcement by developing tests that would be made available to local agencies on a voluntary basis (as opposed to the tests being mandatory for all agencies). In this way, each agency could use the tests in a manner which best suits their local needs.

Accordingly, POST undertook to develop job-related tests that could be adopted and used in a manner consistent with local employment practices and conditions.
